

Riley Street Station operated as a commuter train station from 1867-1973. On December 23, 1867 the first passenger train rolled into East Aurora from Buffalo, NY. By 1884, Buffalo had become one of the most important railroad centers in the world and one of the Pennsylvania Railroad's biggest hubs. Passengers were able to board a train in East Aurora and travel to virtually any destination in the country through Buffalo's Central Terminal.

Riley Street Station was originally an all wood structure built in the late 1880's. However the building itself was considered to be rather unsightly and was a source of public outcry within the community. Citizens called for a redesign of the station by the PRR, demanding for a more aesthetically pleasing building to better represent both the image and appeal of East Aurora. So In 1917, to appease the public the PRR rebuilt the station as it exists today.

At Riley Street Station's peak, 18 Passenger trains traveled through East Aurora each day. However as the automobile industry developed, the demand for rail travel diminished. Eventually the trend was too much for local passenger trains to compete with and the PRR began closing operations at small town commuter stations such as East Aurora. The last passenger train departed Riley Street Station on December 31, 1973, taking with it over a 100 year history of commuter rail service in East Aurora and effectively ending a monumental era for America.
